There he found plenty of cedar and oak-trees, and thought starvation was certainly an impossibility. He enjoyed himself for a considerable time, nibbling first at one and then at another, running up and down the trees to his hearts content, till he had nearly reached the little summer-house, when a short yelping bark sent a thrill of terror through his plucky little heart, as a rough shaggy terrier emerged from a large rabbit-hole close by, half covered with mud, and licking his lips, as though he had been feasting on some of its unlucky inhabitants. He did not, however, seem to have satisfied either his hunger or his love of hunting, for catching sight of the trembling...
