That night of gloom was followed by a clear and resplendent morning. The sun arose without a cloud to obscure his ardent rays; and there was no evidence that two fierce thunder-storms had swept over the country during the previous night, save that which was found in the globules of rain in the glistening leaves and grass, the rivulets flowing by the wayside, and the muddy condition of the road. There was a very late breakfast at Mr. Belgrave s residence; but the persons who gathered around the board gave decided proof that the cloud was lifted from the family again, and that the old days of cheerfulness were in a fair way of restoration. Even Mrs. Belgrave, who had been suffering for weeks from depression of spirits and physical debility, was at her old place at the head of the table, presiding...
